If an item is mislabeled or a particular stock item has low or no demand for it, the item may have little or no value at auction. For this reason, it is important for a vendor or bidder to be able to quickly, and accurately, identify a particular item that has no value to the seller, or if a particular item is mislabeled, or that is a low demand item. If a vendor or bidder identifies such an item or mislabeled item, it is often desirable to sell the item separately, for a lower price. When a seller or auctioneer wishes to sell a specific item at auction or in a listed estate, the auctioneer or seller uses a product description that is specific to the item being sold. For example, a product description that may be used for a vacuum cleaner might be "A versatile all-purpose vacuum cleaner with a bagging system." If a bidder recognizes this description and the vacuum cleaner is being auctioned off, they can reserve the vacuum cleaner by providing a bid on the description of the item, such as "A versatile all-purpose vacuum cleaner with a bagging system" for $500. If no one else has purchased this specific item, the vacuum cleaner can be sold at auction for this low price. The product description should be able to identify specific details of the item to be sold, such as the item's name, its characteristics, such as its brand, type, and color, its serial
