Free CalendarAarhus University Hospital could be the first in Denmark to receive new European guidelines on radiation oncology treatment. When you're taking care of patients with cancer, you have to deal with an enormous range of diseases, from lung cancer to prostate cancer, says Professor Lene Kaaberbøl, head of the Department of Radiology and Medical Physics. "Doctors have to deal with patients with diseases that are not even visible and not even sensitive to radiation, but which may also harm the patients or their tumors," says Kaaberbøl. Glitches in the system In an attempt to standardize how the best treatments are delivered and ensure patient safety, the European Society for Radiotherapy and Oncology (ESTRO) has updated their guidelines for radiotherapy. The update was released on January 4th. Radiotherapy involves sending rays of radiation at targeted tumors. These rays can be in the form of medical x-rays or particle beams. "For example, in brachytherapy, a tiny catheter is inserted into the body and radioactive material is put in the target. The catheter is withdrawn, and we still need a number of x-rays to keep the patient from losing their cancer," says Kaaberbøl. The new guidelines also cover the use of stereotactic body radiotherapy, which is not far behind
