Four key areas were targeted with regard to the data collection: Player movement Player acceleration and player “vitality” Passing and shooting Off-ball movements “Vitality” FIFA will capture player movements with precision, detail and accuracy, in order to get these data and capture the intricacies of player movement and body positioning. For example, players’ movement will be captured within 0.1 meter accuracy. FIFA will also capture player acceleration and identify its peak, the duration of the acceleration and also the player’s ability to sustain acceleration and deceleration during a match. It will also capture when a player’s “vitality” is at its highest. This results from running and fighting, ball control, acceleration, over the top and through the ball. “Vitality” is more realistic as it has been related to the density of the data captured. In “HyperMotion Technology,” players in the game will be more lively as it relates to their body movements and their ability to recover after a challenge or fight for the ball. A player's body movements may slow down during a match, but he will be able to recover after a fight, due to the greater density of data captured in high-speed matches. "Vitality" will also be captured when a player passes and shoots. The amount of pressure and acceleration captured will vary depending on the position where the pass or shot was launched. For example, if it was a long pass, the player will have a small amount of pressure, but a higher amount of acceleration on this pass, than a short pass or a through ball. In the same way as player movements, player passes and shots will have a greater amount of data captured and details according to the different types of passes such as short, long, through ball, low, medium, high and lob. Passes and shots will also be more accurate, resulting in a more realistic gameplay experience. Passing and shooting Passing and shooting will also benefit greatly from the use of "HyperMotion Technology." This is
