At what stage of web development should you learn how to make HTML5 for compatibility? I was looking into HTML5 development a few weeks ago but didn't start the journey yet. As I was familiar with PHP, CSS, JavaScript and HTML, so I was thinking of starting to learn the new standards. But when I started to research about HTML5, I realized it's going to take a long time for me to become an expert for that. So I want to know, where should I start right now? I'm just confused at what to learn first, what's more important, JS, CSS, HTML or PHP? A: The first thing you should learn is HTML5. It's a standard, so you can learn it at any stage you choose. When I started in web development years ago, I learned the standard first, later came html5 and then other, more functional, CSS features. Learn the language, there is nothing preventing you from learning other languages in the meantime. When I started, I thought that CSS would dominate, but the web is changing so fast, that seems like a very short lived assumption. In reality, a lot of functionality is available for use in CSS3 and HTML5 without having to learn new tags.
