The present invention relates to a system for controlling a hydromechanical transmission for driving the propeller shaft of a watercraft in a continuous revolution. Watercraft are driven by a motor of the internal combustion type or by a motor of the hydraulic type. However, these motors are either not powerful enough or are too bulky for using in small-sized watercraft, such as pleasure crafts. A large propeller type motor has been used in an auxiliary power system for propelling watercraft. This system, however, requires a large power source and a long time for starting, requires a large installation space, and makes noise while running. Recently, the use of a small-sized motor has been in vogue for a small-sized watercraft. By using such a motor, it is possible to realize a reduction of space for installing a power source and to make noise little while running. In the case of a watercraft having a small-sized motor, it is necessary to provide a planetary gear type transmission having a high torque and reduction ratio in order to obtain a large amount of drive force. In case of using a hydromechanical transmission, it is necessary to arrange hydraulic systems to synchronize the rotation of a reduction gear with the rotation of a motor. However, the provision of a planetary gear type transmission having a high torque and reduction ratio requires the provision of hydraulic systems for synchronizing the rotation of the reduction gear with the rotation of the motor. Further, when such hydraulic systems are provided, it is also necessary to provide a control system for controlling the delivery and oil pressure within the hydraulic systems.
