A: Your original question seems to stem from a confusion about the different meanings of 'it' in the test. You gave if it = it + 'it', what does that equal in the test? This is a basic misunderstandings of the English Language. 'It' is being used as the singular subject of the sentence, meaning 'it'. So you should be looking at something like if it = it + 'it', is it true? There are two errors. Firstly, 'it' should not be in parens. Secondly, you are saying it when you mean 'it'. To avoid this confusion in the future, you should always fully explain what you mean, and whether you are asking a question or giving an assertion. This includes providing the context and the context should be provided in full. If you have a question, then there should be read in two possible ways: you have a fact question: What does it = it + 'it' equal in the test? You have an opinion question: what does it = it + 'it' equal in the test
